Amoxтли is a film project developed primarily in Mexico initiated by Vir Andres Hera with invited collaborators. It was filmed across Tlaxcala, Puebla, Oaxaca, Mexico City, and rural plateaus marked by archaeological, agricultural, and migratory histories. Additional fragments were recorded in France, where sections of the voice-over were written and performed, and in New York City within Mexican communities on 8mm film.

The project articulates a decolonial cinematic methodology grounded in landscape, collective writing, and embodied knowledge. Cinema is approached as a site of situated encounter rather than representation. The structure emerged from extended conversations, improvisations, and shared reflection generated through dialogue, and friction.

The performers are activists and cultural workers engaged in specific political communities: trans and Afro-Mexican activists based in Mexico City; members of anti-racist collectives such as Prietologías; Muxe artists from Oaxaca; non-binary rural practitioners rooted in territorial struggles. Their presence is anchored in lived political practice, Amoxтли stages encounters between their distinct positions without collapsing them into a unified identity. Difference, contradiction, and negotiation remain visible.

Landscape functions as a structural partner. Archaeological ruins, volcanic soil, cemeteries, dry fields, and stone walls are approached as material witnesses to colonial extraction, evangelization, racial hierarchy, and survival. The camera moves through these terrains as a searching body. Geological time and contemporary activism coexist within the same frame.

The film unfolds through a series of chapters, including:

Everywhere My Brown Shoe Steps

Malintzin Panteon [Alone, but never lonely]

And they became witches

Las Ancestras [A conversation over the ruins]

Camera Serpent

Baby house of Amoxтли

Es una mujer y nada más

About my name

El Encanto

No tengas miedo de los truenos [Fête foraine]

Bois Brilé

Across these chapters, Amoxтли investigates how knowledge circulates outside dominant archival systems. Oral transmission, rumor, erotic memory, humor, grief, and collective speculation shape the film's writing. Scenes move between documentary conversation, staged fiction, ritual gesture, and intimate confession. Cinematic authority is fragmented through demultiplication. Multiple cameras operate simultaneously, producing parallel vantage points that resist hierarchical framing. As no single perspective stabilizes the image, vision becomes relational rather than extractive.

Language intensifies this structure. Spanish, English, French, and Nahuatl circulate across the film. The voice-over introduces distance and displacement. Misalignment between languages is preserved and translation remains partial.

Amoxтли forms the second movement of a trilogy that began with Le Daftar and continues with Incwadi. Anchored in Mexico while tracing transnational circuits, the film approaches cinema as a collective practice in which communities articulate, contest, and reconfigure themselves, and where the camera remains accountable to their presence.
